Sumi Budhi was woken up every morning by Sugi. As roosters crowed outside

KOOKROOKOO

Sugi honked into a sleeping Sumi Budhi’s ear indoors.

“Your best friend wakes you up early every morning,” said Moso Hadam, Sumi Budhi’s husband.

“Yes, it’s good to wake up early,” Sumi Budhi replied.

She opened the door and began sweeping the racha, the courtyard.
Swish swish, went Sumi Budhi’s broom.
Sugi trailed after her, bobbing her neck.
Sugi picked out ants and worms for breakfast.
From the roof, Bhutu the naughty cat, watched Sugi eat.
After sweeping the house, Sumi Budhi picked up a pile of clothes lying in a corner.
“I need to buy soap to wash these clothes,” she said to herself.
There was a tiny grocery shop at the end of the village.
Sugi marched behind Sumi Budhi all the way there.
“Johar,” said Sawna, the shopkeeper, greeting Sumi Budhi. “Johar,” said Sumi Budhi. “How is your companion today?” he asked. “Good,” Sumi Budhi smiled. “As always, she woke me up this morning.”
Then Sumi Budhi walked to the pond. Sugi waddled behind her. In her beak, Sugi held two bars of soap—a white one for bathing and a brown one for washing.

Two other women, Baha and Miru, were at the pond, washing clothes.

“Sumi Budhi’s companion is so smart,” said Miru.
As Sumi Budhi washed clothes, Sugi swam in the pond. Every few minutes, she let out a happy cry. KWAK KWAK KWAKKWAK KYUK

Sugi ducked under water and hunted around for tiny, glassy-looking fish.
At home, Moso Hadam roasted fish, and cooked rice and pui leaves. The fish smelt delicious. “I can’t wait to eat,” Sumi Budhi said as she oiled her hair. Moso Hadam was peeling onions when Bhutu sneaked into the kitchen. “Wait,” Moso Hadam told Bhutu. “You will get your share later.”

“No,” said Moso Hadam sternly and went to wash the onions. Bhutu stopped whining and stared at the roasted fish.
Seeing no one around, Bhutu moved stealthily towards the plates and was just about to grab the head of a roasted fish when—

TUBUKKK

Sugi pecked Bhutu, first on the tail and then on the head.

Tubuktubuktubuk

Moso Hadam rushed to the kitchen. “Dhurr... pusi!” he shouted at Bhutu. “Get lost, you cat!”
Bhutu ran out the kitchen and on to the roof. He looked sad. Seeing Bhutu sad, Sugi felt sad too. She flapped up to the roof and sat near him. Tenderly, she began rubbing her beak on Bhutu’s body.

“Just look at them!” said Sumi Budhi. “Come. Come down both of you.”
“Should we eat?” Moso Hadam asked Sugi and Bhutu. Sumi Budhi and Moso Hadam shared a piece of fish with Bhutu. And Sugi pecked on rice and pui leaves.
